The extent of the world s indebtedness to China in these arts is only now being realized. In the opinion of most Chinese Literati the Flowery Kingdom was at its best during the Tang Dynasty. Students flocked from India and Japan to study the cultured arts at the Court of the Tang Emperors. Present day foreign connoisseurs likewise agree in ascribing to the Tang and Sung artists on paper and silk the distinctive characteristics in conception and execution which mark the zenith in this branch of Chinese art. The discovery of Porcelain in the Sung period appears at first to have aroused little enthusiasm and its capabilities as a medium for artistic expression was not recognised until much later on. At first the shapes were primitive and simple, resembling in form earthenware articles in common use. In the reign of the Emperor Yung Loh the famous egg shell bowls were produced, but still no attempt at enrichment by colouring was made, engraved or embossed designs on the paste being the only decoration. With the advent of the Ming period a distinct change is noticeable and a conception of the possibilities of colour on porcelain seems to have been awakened; and the objections of the artist to lend his brush to what might be deemed a material industry was overcome.
