Not illustrated. 1809 Excerpt: . . . to Shakespeare imputes to the two antagonists of Warburton. In a moment of petulance, he would sting like a fly, suck a little blood, take a gay flutter, and return, no more. But in seasons of rage he would bite like a viper, and would have been glad to leave inflammation and gangrene behind him. Never can the well-wishers of Mr. Fox forget the treatment which he experienced from the opponent to whom I advert, when enfeebled by diseases and harrassed by care he attended the business of the house of Commons in the Session before his death. The strength, of that opponent bore, indeed, little proportion to his malignity. But his noisy, restless, querulous, insolent freaks of hostility must often have brought to your mind the odious office which a poet of antiquity has assigned to one of the Dine; and often has he provoked...
